

The European Journal of Development Research

Co-Editor opportunities

The European Journal of Development Research (EJDR) is an ISI-rated journal that seeks to broaden understanding of the processes that advance or impede human development. As an interdisciplinary journal, articles published in the EJDR draw on a variety of viewpoints including political, economic, sociological and anthropological perspectives. The journal benefits an international readership of academics and practitioners and it is the official journal of the European Association of Development Research and Training Institutes (EADI).

The EJDR is seeking to recruit three new co-editors to join its editorial team. In all three instances, we are looking for a research-active scholar based in the global North or South with extensive experience of publishing, editing and reviewing for high-ranking academic journals.

The co-editors will join an active editorial team, amongst which management of the paper review process is shared to ensure that editors manage papers within their area of expertise. Members of the editorial team receive financial support to promote the journal at relevant international conferences.

The vacancies are as follows:

Two Co-Editors with expertise related to sociology, anthropology and/or human geography perspectives on international development

These individuals should bring the perspectives of sociology, anthropology and/or human geography to international development. They might have expertise and experience related, for example, to rural development, gender, migration, urbanisation, etc. At least one of these positions will be filled by an individual with skills and experience in the application of qualitative and/or mixed methods.

One bilingual French/ English Co-Editor with a broad-based expertise in international development research

This individual must be able to handle submissions in both English and French. They should have broad-based expertise and experience in international development research using quantitative and qualitative approaches and interdisciplinary perspectives.

Application process:

To be considered for any one of these roles, please email your curriculum vitae (including a list of publications and awards) and a covering letter detailing the role for which you wish to be considered and the skills and experience you would bring.

Your application should be emailed to the Managing Editor of the EJDR, Natalia Lorenzoni at n.lorenzoni@uea.ac.uk (copying in n.lorenzoni@outlook.com).

Closing date for the receipt of applications is 18th November 2018.
