Dear colleagues

We would like to draw to your attention a workshop Meeting the challenges of interdisciplinary research for global development: strengthening sustainable agriculture and food systems, to be held on 10 April 2018, at the University of Greenwich campus by the river in South east London.

This is the first of a series of workshops promoted by the Development Studies Association (DSA) in coordination with different development studies centres in 2018 and 2019, an initiative which is gathering interest from CGRF and the ESRC. A concept note for the workshop and the anticipated agenda is attached.

This is an invitation only event but there are likely to be some additional spaces and we are very interested to have participation from a wider range of researchers from other centres with experience of interdisciplinary work on sustainable agriculture, food security, nutrition and natural resources management.

If you would like to attend the workshop, please notify Pamela Katic at NRI p.katic@gre.ac.uk.

In particular, if you would be interested in making a short 5 – 10 minute pitch at the opening session in the afternoon to present a case study example of good practice, challenges, methods opportunities or innovations in interdisciplinary research to address food, agriculture and natural resource related development problems, please send us a short outline statement in one or two paragraphs.

We will confirm the full participants' list and final agenda in mid-March.

Thank you for your interest and kind regards
